COLLABORATIVE RESEARCH NETWORK

Welcome to the latest issue of On the Margins Newsletter

In this issue, we share the latest news and updates from On the Margins network including our upcoming events, recent activities, related external events and more!

What is 'research' – the view from the margins

In academia research is defined as any form of 'disciplined inquiry' or 'process of investigation' that produces new knowledge or insights and includes work that is of 'direct relevance' to the society. Yet organisations, groups and individuals who engage in research activities with or outside academia may see, use or value research in different ways. For example, as the indigenous author Linda Tuhiwai Smith has shown, her participants saw (Western) research not as a 'process of investigation producing new insights' but as a 'dirty' word and a 'dehumanising' practice.

In this webinar we problematised the idea of 'research' approaching it from the perspective of participants and practitioners representing grassroots groups and organisations.

Co-production across cultural contexts

This international seminar explored how local and national contexts shape participatory research and knowledge co-production. It involved academics and activists sharing experiences of doing participatory research across different countries including UK, Finland, and Poland.

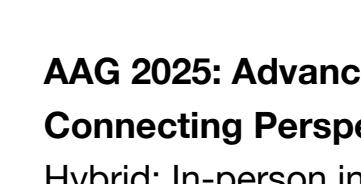

The seminar was a collaboration between "On the Margins" and Faculty of Social Sciences at University of Helsinki. It took in person at Edinburgh Napier University, Merchiston Campus.
